Comments on IPCC Geothermal Paper
(via e-mail; received: 13 June 2008)

I have read over the paper forwarded to me by Roy Baria ("The possible role and contribution of geothermal energy to the mitigation of climate change"), and while the information presented in the paper is good I found the organization to be different from what I was expecting. My feeling is that the material referenced in the title -- the potential for geothermal energy to mitigate climate change -- should be at the beginning of the paper, and the explanation of geothermal technology and resources should be moved to the back, possibly as an appendix or addendum. For a person seeking information on climate change mitigation, the material presently at the front would be a distraction to wade through.
